Most real estate companies have traditionally operated in an entrepreneurial fashion with the back office relegated to an afterthought. Yet, industry leaders today have committed to building an optimized enterprise that leverages improved business intelligence, provides for a more optimal client experience, better risk management and lower-cost long-term operations. The advent of the PropTech movement and the pace at which the industry is moving has accentuated the divide between the leaders and the rest.

Analytics and Data Management Services

The most forward-thinking organizations view data as an asset in order to make better investment decisions, manage risk and provide insightful data to investors. Data governance is critical, as are effective processes and supporting technologies. In the past, real estate industry data was non-transparent; systems had closed architectures, basic metrics had no standardized definitions and the few sources of available industry data were unreliable. Yet, recent years have seen a revolution in terms of new tools, technologies and data sources. Many organizations have access to voluminous amounts of data but are challenged to define data uses and implement processes and technologies to sustain effective data management. Data in today's market has become a competitive differentiator.

- Data Strategy and Design
- Data Governance
- Data Analytics and Dashboard Design
